Proper funding for all our public services – from the NHS to local councils, from education to policing – so that they can meet rising demand and the diverse needs of all our communities.

The right number of appropriately trained staff to keep our services safe and effective – so that quality of care and standards of service that the public deserve can be guaranteed.

A voice for local communities about how their public services are provided – so that all services, including specialist services, are responsive to local needs.

The economic benefits of public services to be recognised – so investment, jobs and decent pay boost local economies and create opportunities.

More openness – so that decisions about who provides local services and how they do it are clear and can be properly scrutinised.

We all need our public services. Our parks and libraries, clean and safe streets, schools and town halls. They make our communities into the places we call home.

And when we get sick, or frailer, the NHS and social care are there to help.

Now, after nearly 10 years of cuts and a million jobs lost, it is getting harder and harder for staff to deliver public services.

Don't leave it till it's too late. If you care about public services get involved – but whatever you do, do it now!

Your public services are in crisis.
