

Stand up for social work

The government is pushing through plans to accredit children and family social workers in England – despite backlash from the profession and experts. UNISON believes social work needs funding not more tests. There are already robust standards of practice in place.

UNISON is campaigning for the National Assessment and Accreditation System to be scrapped. It is a waste of time and money, piles more pressure on overworked social workers and takes them away from frontline work.

We need all social workers to get involved in our campaign to stand up for social work. If the NAAS goes ahead we think it will be extended to other social workers in England. The government must listen to the profession.

Join UNISON and stop accreditation

3 things you can do:

1. Sign our petition at www.unison.org.uk/naas
2. Organise a meeting in your workplace to discuss accreditation with colleagues – find out more about NAAS on the campaign page www.unison.org.uk/standupforsocialwork
3. If you're not a member already, join UNISON. We can't win this without you! Visit unison.org.uk/join
